Pearl Meyer's latest pulse survey included 20 participants within the oilfield services and drilling sector. The findings shed light on salary adjustments, incentive payouts, and the changing landscape of ESG-related metrics in incentive plans. We summarize base salary adjustments and incentive plan payouts below.

Base Salary Adjustments for 2025

- Overall, the median expected base salary increase is 3.50% for 2025, however there is some variation by employee level
  - Executive salaries are expected to increase 3.50% at the median.
  - Non-exempt employees are increasing at a higher rate of 4.00%.
- This current overall projection marks a slight decline from more bullish, mid-year forecasts of 4.00% for 2025.

Incentive Plan Payouts for FY2024

While mid-year 2024 projections were trending higher, a softer fourth quarter in the sector resulted in a slight decline in expectations for salary increase and incentive payouts.

- Annual incentive payouts for FY2024 are forecasted to be at or just below target levels (75%-100%).
- Long-term incentive plans closing in FY2024 follow a similar trend, with 58% of companies paying within the 75%-100% range.
- This marks a slight decline from mid-year projections that were trending just above target.

With the incoming administration focused on increased domestic production, oilfield service companies could see increased activity and a focus on goal-setting for incentive plans will be critical. Companies in the sector should continue to review their compensation programs to ensure they balance uncertainty/cyclicality in the industry and external pressures, while remaining competitive and retentive.
